From the London Times. St. Johns, October 24, 1901. The Duke and Duchess of Cornwall will certainly carry the impression that the illumination in the last part of oversea Britain which they have visited was the prettiest of all save one. Melbourne was magnificent; the Ottawa Parliament House was in my opinion superior; the vaunted Pan-American came next; but St. Johns alone has equalled in sheer beauty the unsurpassable display at Malta. Imagine a narrow arm of the sea, girt with lofty hills crowned with flaring bonfires, the most primitive and most effective form of illumination. Below lay the warships, motionless towers of electricity, also the multitudinous fishing craft, their lights swaying to and fro in a gentle ripple. It was a vision of delight. To-day the weather, though it had improved, WAS STILL BOISTEROUS when the Royal party landed and received a masculine, robust welcome from the fishing population. These, indeed, are a hardy race, living their laborious lives contentedly, while a quintal of dried cod represents a barrel of flour. Further, they are full of naval ardor. Hereby hangs a tale better worth telling than any account of the ceremonies and also more interesting to the Duke himself, who follows the Naval Reserve question closely. Here, as in Australia, is naval ardor, combined with a sense of f discouragement and grievance. The position was stated to me yesterday by a prominent politician in a form which I faintly...
