In his speech at the public dinner which was given to the Captain A.d. 1838, in the Glen Ury Distillery at Stonehaven, he spoke much of the old roan, and termed him a heaven-born improver. The phrase did not apply to his grandfather, who was quite displeased with his son for carrying a bundle of trees on his back the fifteen miles from Aberdeen, and planting them in The Den of Ury. Protecting the plants, he said, would annoy people s cattle and sheep, and he wouldn t have them annoyed. This was just a year before his death, and allowance was to be made for the peevishness of age. When the Captain s father succeeded, he went to Norfolk, where he had first graduated in agriculture, to look out for...
